In September 2000, Google began operating a search engine in Chinese by offering 24 million web pages in Chinese language. By 2002, Google had gained lot of popularity in China owing to its simplicity and ability to carry out searches effectively. During that time, the Chinese government was blocking several websites through IP filters intermittently. The blocking increased during times of heightened security like the anniversary of Tiananmen Square events, the national party congress, etc. The market was lucrative because of its size. China had the second largest number of Internet users after the US. Google felt that only a local presence could help it to provide better and more reliable services to customers. To operate in China, Google needed an Internet Content Provider license, which required it to filter its content. In April 2005, after obtaining permission from the Ministry of Information Industry in China, Google announced the opening of a representative office in Shanghai (Mainland China), and registered the URL - www.google.com.cn

Analysts opined that with Internet users would have a better experience after the launch of Google.cn, and Google may once again emerge as the most preferred search engine in the country. According to findings reported by Keynote Systems in January 2006, Google was in a strong position to challenge Baidu in the Chinese search engine market. The study concluded that Chinese users, once they started using Google, preferred it to any other search engine.
